When the Audience Yelled Like
He Began Fighting Like a Demon.

HIS FRIENDS LOST MONEY.

They Thought the Chicagoan Clever Enough to Last Six Rounds and Bet Accordingly—
The Money Divided.

Charley Hamilton, president of the West End Club, returned yesterday from Chicago, where he had been to interview the stars of the Tattersalls and also at the Star Theatre. He expressed himself as being greatly impressed with the speed of the round contests in the Windy City, and was enthusiastic over Terry McDevitt's victories. That Mr. Hamilton is a close observer of human nature in general and gamblers in particular is illustrated by his remarks about the battle.

"Early in the fourth round," said the young St. Louis promoter, "while the multitude in Tattersalls' cried 'Take,' it was a wonderful metamorphosis took place. It was the transformation of a piglet into a fighting demon. That great audience was hushed. The intense personality of the little madman from Brooklyn permeated the very atmosphere. Those eyes, little upturned nose, that seemed to vibrate with impatience, and to be in no hurry to enter the ring, were like diamonds. The audience, too, was like diamonds. Every blow that Terry McDevitt landed was like a bullet. The crowd, too, was like diamonds. They thought the Chicagoan clever enough to last six rounds and bet accordingly—the money divided.
